Modern technology and ancient agriculture meet in a site-specific installation by photographer Ansen Seale.

Seale created the installation in a century-old structure known as "the Corn Crib" located on property owned by the Land Heritage Institute of the Americas. The stacked-stone caliche building was once used to store corn, hence it's name and the title of the installation. "The Corn Crib" opens as part of Fotoseptiembre USA 5 to 7 p.m. Sunday (Sept. 20). Afterward, the installation will be on view by appointment. Contact .

For the installation, Seale made images of corn using the "slitscan" digital panoramic camera he invented. Transparencies in solar-powered light boxes strung from the rafters function as the sole source of illumination in the building.

The gate for institute is on Neal Road between Applewhite and Pleasanton roads. The Google Maps address is 1299 Neal Road.
